

Week 9

I think emerging adulthood should be considered separate from adolescence. Adolescence is mostly about growing up under parents' rules, while emerging adulthood is a time when people have more freedom but are not fully settled yet. People ages 18 to 25 are making important choices about school, work, and relationships, but they often change paths many times. This stage feels different because many people feel in between being a teenager and being an adult. The reading by Jeffrey Jensen Arnett explains this well by showing how identity exploration, instability, and new possibilities are common during this age.

I want to know more about how emerging adulthood affects mental health. Many young adults feel hopeful, but they also feel stressed, anxious, or unsure about the future. Learning more about how to support people during this stage would be helpful.
